...retaining free movement of people for a transitional period, a proposal outlined by finance minister Philip Hammond on Friday.

Hammond had said should be no immediate changes to immigration or trading rules when Britain leaves the EU in March 2019, and the status quo could endure until mid-2022.

"If there have been discussions on that, I have not been party to them," Fox told the newspaper.

"I have not been involved in any discussion on that, nor have I signified my agreement to anything like that."

Divisions between ministers over Brexit strategy have become more open after Prime Minister Theresa May lost her majority in an early election she called in June. With May away on holiday, the debate has intensified.

Hammond has led a push within the government to secure a business-friendly Brexit that avoids a sudden change in 2019 in the relationship between Britain and the EU, which buys nearly half the country's exports.

Fox had previously said he backed a transition agreement to smooth Britain's exit from the trading bloc, but on Sunday he indicated that free movement should not continue.

"We made it clear that

...economy secretary Keith Brown has written to British ministers on behalf of the estimated £4-billion Scotch whisky industry to replicate the EU's definition of whisky which currently protects sales from sub-standard products.

"Aside from being a key part of Scottish culture and identity, our whisky industry supports around 20,000 jobs. The US made clear in the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership discussions that they would support a relaxation of the definition of whisky, which would open the market up to a number of products which do not currently meet that standard," said Brown.

...international trade secretary Liam Fox.

"After reports this week that the UK government is contemplating trade deals that threaten the value and reputation of Scottish produce, once again we can see the confusion which is at the heart of the UK government's Brexit position. We need to be sure that any future deals work for Scotland and are not threatening the livelihoods of our farmers and producers," he said.

Scotland wants all the devolved governments of the UK to have oversight of the negotiations to ensure that the 'right outcomes for everyone are secured'.
